9. Reason for proposed action:

Criminal Justice is a growing interdisciplinary field with large societal impact. Knowledge of justice system functions and processes and the causes, correlates, and consequences of criminal behavior is applicable for improved outcomes across a variety of agencies, industries, and organizations. Thus, while some students may not necessarily want to pursue justice careers consistent with a criminal justice major, education in criminal justice can nonetheless enhance or complement their major degrees in other disciplines and fields of study, including, but not limited to, sociology, social work, education and health professions, law, psychology, world languages, and computer engineering. Currently, graduate students in Sociology have the opportunity to shape their degrees to meet their research and career interests (via a concentration in Criminology), undergraduate students of any discipline do not have the opportunity to tailor their education in this regard. Establishing a minor in criminal justice that will enable students to customize their degrees to their specific goals; education and credentials in criminal justice can help further their career pursuits and marketability in areas in which justice knowledge is not the primary requirement, but is certainly relevant and useful.
